Can you trust most people? If you are like two-thirds of Americans, you doubt it. Researchers have asked this question for decades — and no surprise, Americans' social trust is at a 50-year low point. It matters. Distrust shrinks our lives, makes us feel alone and has left the country divided and in gridlock. Yet there's a quiet revolution going on. People in communities everywhere are showing up for neighbors despite their differences and weaving a strong, inclusive social fabric. Any of us can become these weavers. Meet four people who are building trust with neighbors, and learn about Weave: The Social Fabric Project.

Learn how these social weavers are restoring hope, starting where they live.
